Target group interdisciplinary

One's own voice is the most personal and subtle way of expressing oneself. To get the listener's attention, a speech presentation must be convincing in voice and rhetoric. If one's voice is too low, raspy or breathy, if one talks too fast and breathlessly, people will not listen - even though the contents may be meaningful and important. Studies show that the success of a speech presentation is made up only by 20% of its content and 80% by the way it is presented. Women have more difficulties than their male colleagues to take and hold the floor in a discussion and a debate.

In this workshop, participants will practise breathing techniques and their vocal and speaking skills for presentations and daily life. They will gain more experience in using their own voice and learn how to take their point of view vocally.

The workshop will also be offered in German on 09 – 10 July, 2012.
